Bridging Universiti Malaysia Pahang to the world community

Nation Building in Malaysia

Nationalism is a key foundation in developing nation-building.

By taking into account of one factor that has always been used to categorise a country and its people, which is the identity of the nation but also a force that can unite the people.

Language also denotes the peoples' identification to the country, their acceptance of the country's interests

According to Universiti Kebangsaan Malaysia (UKM)'s Institute of Ethnic Study (KITA) and Institute of Malay Studies, Professor Dato' Dr. Teo Kok Seong, language had proven to be a force to be reckoned with throughout the

“For example, during the ancient days of China, Emperor Shih Huang Ti had successfully used language, i.e. the Chinese writing system, to unite the people of China, a country of diverse dialects.

“It is the same in the modern era, for language especially the native language or mother tongue, has been demonstrated to be successful in the West and some good examples that are often highlighted are those of English and German.

“In this region, Indonesia is seen as having effectively united its people, said to consist of some 1,500 ethnic groups and dialects. And not only that, the Indonesians are very articulate in their language. They love their language and use it during an intellectual discourse held at Universiti Malaysia Pahang.

The intellectual discourse, Program Bicara Cendekiawan Mulia Siri 5, was organised by the Vice-Chancellor of UMP.

It was held at the Banquet Hall, Tun Abdul Razak Chancellery in UMP Pekan Campus on December 19, 2013.

Professor Dato’ Dr. Teo said Malaysia had been determined to use the Malay language, already enshrined in the constitution, to integrate its multi-racial people.

“The use of the language as a tool of unison was stated in the Razak Report in 1956 which later became the Education Act 1957 and eventually, the Education Act 1961 and 1996.

“In Part 17 of the Education Act 1996 (that replaces the Act of 1961) and under the title ‘National Language’ it states that the national language must be the main medium of language in all learning institutes in the National Education System.

“Since 1957, the Malay language has already played the role as a language to unite the people, in the context of the country, he said.

On how far this sovereign state had advocated the Malay language and whether it had successfully reflected its national identity, his reply was: ‘No’.

He said in the context of the Malay language being appreciated as a nation language that could be used to unite the united nation and reflect the nation’s linguistic identity, it had failed in Malaysia.

“It is time for us to rationally scrutinise the reasons behind this failure. To me, the main reason is that some people do not speak the language fluently, the language of the country.

“There should be a ruling or an edict that every citizen must know the country’s language very well and have it as a second language.

“It is not only about not having a good command of the language that has become a problem, there seems to be a lack of interest in the language, an unwillingness among the Chinese society for example, to not to identify themselves with the Malay language.”

However, the government had tried for so long to overcome the problem of misunderstanding relating to the Malay language.

“This can be seen from the efforts taken by the government to improve Malay language skills in vernacular schools. The number of hours of teaching the language, from 180 minutes to 270 minutes every week for pupils of Year Four, Year Five and Year Six.”

“Another is to streamline the syllabus at national schools (Sekolah Kebangsaan) and vernacular schools (Sekolah Kebangsaan Cina).

“However, these efforts were met with strong objections by the Chinese, seen through the articles by Chin Joo Kah. It can be clearly seen from issues involving the teaching of Jawi through khat lessons in idioms which was raised in the past. It was emerging again in the middle of December the same year,” he said.

He also said the government appeared to ‘concede’ to the pressures of these vernacular education activists. The number of pages had been reduced from six pages to three pages from the total pages of 164 for Year 4 and by making it an elective subject.

“However, the Chinese-stream education activists, Dong Jiao Zong, continued to mount pressure on the government to appoint them, through the Board of School, so they can have the final say on choices to be made by parents. Matters involving teaching Jawi writings to Chinese children.

“This kind of attitude is anti-national in nature as they are going against the national interest, of the Malay language and of the Malay language being the national aspiration and a tool of unity.

“This is especially so after the matter was already mutually agreed in the Agreement of Independence or Pengakuan.

“Based on these examples, it clearly shows that we are not united, we are not united in our heart and soul. We are not united in the national language,” he added.

In other words, there was no solid support from a group of people to accept or in making good the national language. The meaning of the Malay language as a national language and a tool of unity.

“A negara bangsa generally refers to a sovereign country that has gained independence, and the citizens living in it.”

“A united citizen, be it a homogenous one – that comprises only one race such as Japan or a heterogeneous one such as Malaysia, exists because of various factors that are eventually progressed into the country’s policies.

“These policies are drawn up because the country and the people have the same language, history, culture

The intellectual discourse is a monthly programme that features prominent figures within the country and a issues.

Among those invited to share their ideas and views included veteran politician and former minister Tan Datuk Dr. Nik Safiah Karim who spoke on a topic titled, ‘The Malay Language and Challenges in Strength New Era.’

The guests present at the talk were UMP Vice-Chancellor, Professor Dr. Wan Azhar Wan Yusoff International), Professor Ts. Dr. Mohd. Rosli Hainin, Deputy Vice-Chancellor (Research and Innovation), Deputy Vice-Chancellor (Student Affairs and Alumni), Professor Dato’ Dr. Yuserrie Zainuddin.

“Overcoming Setback”

Changing of supervisor at the very last minute was never a stumbling block for Dr. Mohamad Rusydi Moh managed to finishes his studies on time.

According to him, UMP has given him ample time and space, therefore he feels the need to repay the trust

“With that, I’ve tried my best and went extra mile to complete this study.

“At that time my biggest concern was, whether I can finish my studies on time or not.

"However, with the help and support from my friends and especially the officials in the Registry Department

He added, after a series of discussions with the university and new appointed supervisors, the study resum

"That's when you need to sacrifice everything, including your free times and weekend with the loved one midnight,” he said.

More than anything, Dr. Mohamad Rusydi achieved his goal of completing a PhD within four years, from Purdue University, United States of America.

Dr. Mohamad Rusydi, currently a lecturer at Faculty of Manufacturing and Mechatronics Engineering academic staffs in Staff Appreciation and Completion of Study Ceremony organized by the Registry on 16th

Sharing his experience finishing the PhD, planning and discussion with the supervisor is very important. And hesitate to seek help.

He advises those who are currently continuing their studies to work hard and steadfast to achieve their goals.

“The challenges vary from one to another but it left me with bittersweet memories in this world of PhD.

“In addition, studying abroad has also given me such an amazing experience especially in learning the life. We are more open, bold and hardworking.

“My industry-based research provides me with knowledge to help solve industry problems,” he elaborates further.

As a lecturer, he is proud of the university's achievements especially in world-class rating and recognition.

Also receiving the Graduate on Time (GOT) programme incentive for excellence is Dr. Noor Intan Shafinaz from Process Engineering Technology, Dr. Mohd Fazli Farida Asras, Dr Nazira Mahmud from Faculty of Science and Technology, Mohd Zainudin from Faculty of Industrial Management and Dr. Noradilah Md Nordin from the Centre for Human Resource Development.
